It seems to work well. I'm however wondering how to create a "vim-python" package for my system so it can be used more easily. Doing "vim-python --help" returns the following Which is not really a help to me here. Edit: So I think I can make a python file for which it's only python code. But I have no idea how to create a package so that my users can execute "vim-python path/to/my/file.py" and not "vim path/to/my/file.py" A: Reading the VIM source file that implements vim-python, it seems to be just a wrapper for starting an external process, like python, that provides a vim-python command. So it would seem to depend on what kind of python you are using.
